session of one Indianaoplis woman-not, be it understood, a book wherein are recorded family jars, but one in which there is a record of the births, deaths and happenings that go to make up family history. "Talk about your baby books," says this woman, contemptously, "I'd rather have this scrapbook of mine than a dozen of the namby-pamby records of baby's first tooth and weight that differ only from other people's baby books in the matter of dates or ounces."

The book is indeed a most interesting one and if it is kept up by after generations it will be fully as valuable and far more interesting reading than a family tree. Its pages are a record not only of the members of the immediate family, but of their sisters and their cousins and their aunts, and any disputed question in family history of comparatively recent date may be settled by reference to its pages. Newspaper clippings of weddings, coming-out parties, obituary notices or other items concerning any of the members of the family, are preserved here, and there are, besides, wedding invitations, extracts from letters, concert programmes and a melange of other stuff, some grave, some gay, all interesting. One of the most entertaining bits is a wavery drawing of a solemn cow, with two eyes in one side of her head to give the effect of a full-face portrait, the whole surmounted by a painstakingly printed announcement "This Cow work of art of the daughter of the house, who may some day be an artist in spite of better than this beastly train," he said. "The idea of your starting off all tired out like this." A glimmer of amusement lightened the gloom of the girl's face. "But this isn't the start," she said. "We started last night. That's why we're so dead. Come around on the other side where mother can't hear and I'll tell you all about it.

"You see mother bought one of those cute little traveling clocks and last night when she went to bed she put it on her dressing table so that she could find out the time without disturbing father. She insisted on all of us going to bed at 8 o'clock because we had to drive in you know, and so we had to get up terribly early. Well it seemed to me that I had hardly gone to sleep when she shook me awake again and told me to get up and dress. I did obediently, and by the time I was dressed she had some coffee made-of course we didn't call the cook-and then she went up and waked father and told him to harness the horse. When father came down he said, 'Well, well, what a dark morning,' and I noticed that it wasn't getting a bit lighter, but I was too busy to think much about it. Mother went up to her room to put the last things into her traveling bag and just as father came in to say that everything was ready, we heard her shriek. We rushed upstairs and there she stood in the middle of the floor clasping her traveling clock.

"'Do you know what time it is?' she said. "Father rushed for his watch, which he had left under his pillow. 'Why, it-it's haif past eleven,' he said in the most bewildered way. And so it was. So we all went back to bed."

"But how did it happen?" said the young man who was down to see the girl off. "I perfectly plain, and when mother put it on her table, she put it there upside down. And when she though it was four o'clock it was just half past ten, standing on its head. No, we didn't bring the cute little clock with us."

Woes of a Debutante.

It was her first dinner party after her coming out and she had expected to have a glorious time. She had had an indistinct idea of soft lights and masses of flowers, of brilliant men and beautiful women, and more than all of the brilliant conversation. which in the novels she had read always sparkled most brightly at the dinner table. She had had another indistinct idea that after Oct. 1 at 116 West North street. she was somehow going to be stimulated to say witty things which would impress her neighbors with her cleverness and her brightness, even if she were only just out. and this were her first dinner party.

She had little to say to her chaperon on the way home, and she entered the sitting room with the manner of one whose hopes in life have been laid waste. Her father let his paper go for a minute and looked at dishes are shown in the Kaiserzinn. Tall. ber benignantly over his spectacles.

"Nice party, daughter?" he asked. Daughter flung herself into a disappointed little mass of lace and chiffon on the "Oh it was perfectly dreadwailed. "They gave me nice-looking young man to go in with and then there was such a finelooking elderly man on my other side. But everything that I said to the man on my right he said: 'I beg your pardon, but I cannot understand you. I am deaf in my left ear.' And everything I said to the man on my left he said: 'I am exceedingly sorry, but I am deaf in my right ear and things to each of them, and that dinner was hours long. And if that's the way they treat you after you come out. I'd laces and brooches.

Suggestions to Shoppers.

The lily pattern is about the prettlest thing one can find in silver, and as it comes in every known kind of fork, spoon and ladle a single piece in that design is an acceptable gift.

Any number of lovely things in the way of plates and platters, mugs and other slim goblets, which match the handsome punch bowls sell for $5 apiece. The deby an artistic simplicity.

XXX Many of the handsome new automobile bags have the most fetching handles of braided leather. Others are swung on the usual chains, and the clasps and mountings of all the bags are unusually handsome. Particularly new are the big square clasps which characterize some of the bags. The prices range from $5 up to $10.25.
